An apparent result of massive doses of radiation on native iguanas that occurred during French nuclear weapons detonations. Upon reaching maturity, the creature hunts the largest prey available for food – i.e. fishing trawlers, submarines, schools of fish – and then searches out a suitable nesting site where it lays as many as a hundred automobile sized eggs.

The young emerge from the egg ready and equipped to hunt. Young have stats similar to the parent but in Car scale, and without increased Running and Climbing skills, and without the ability to generate radioactive flame.

Because of their immense size human scale cities can make ideal nesting sites for the creatures. Until the creature perceives humans as a threat it will largely ignore them. But, with hostile action the creature may become more territorial and make displays even at individual humans to warn them off.
